A lesson we have learned from the disruptions of the last few years is the interconnectedness of humankind and the systems we have built. We are still dealing with the consequences of the COVID-19 virus, triggering a global economic crisis, causing volatility in the labor market and underlining the need to build more resilient global supply chains.

At Project Management Institute (PMI), for example, we experienced an overnight shift to a fully remote work model, expanded regionalized staff and produced a broad range of virtual learning events to meet diverse customer needs. This rapid shift necessitated the immediate adoption of new platforms, adherence to different local employment rules and embracing an agile mindset to develop new ways of working. Concurrently, PMI has implemented tools like interactive learning and focused resource hubs to support the broad, global community of project managers who are reckoning with the impacts of the climate crisis and the need to activate environmental, social and governance (ESG) strategies. In this complex setting, project professionals will need to move from a linear thinking model, which considers simple cause and effect as “if I do this, then this will be the result,” to a systems thinking approach that considers the multitude of different interactions, dynamics and factors that can and will impact their project success. Systems thinking is an approach that can help practitioners broaden their view and create what Peter Senge, author of The Fifth Discipline — a widely read book on systems dynamics, calls a “learning organization,” to adapt and respond to changes that determine project outcomes.

“In this environment of continual churn, systems thinking considers mitigating factors which have direct impact on overall project outcomes and allows for the interconnectivity of dependencies to be weighed against each other,” says Daniel Daly, knowledge programs manager at PMI. “Consider the International Space Station, which orbits the earth every 90 minutes. For the seven astronauts to safely and successfully live and work in space, what might be a few of the multitude of interconnected systems that are integral to the success of any mission? An obvious answer would be the technical systems that are involved in maintaining their health.”

Daly, former project management curriculum lead at the NASA Academy of Program/Project and Engineering Leadership, continues, “As there are multiple space agencies from more than a dozen countries involved in maintaining the International Space Station, each space agency possesses its own unique cultural point of view. All these people, along with all the systems they represent and maintain, must be able to work together in identifying problems and keep these interdependent systems operating to ensure mission success.”
